Abstract Competitive authoritarianism has emerged as a major concept in the study of political regimes. The introduction of this special issue revisits Levitsky and Way's seminal study Competitive Authoritarianism: Hybrid Regimes After the Cold War. Although Africa is the world region with the highest absolute number of competitive authoritarian regimes, political scientists working on Africa have rarely engaged with Levitsky and Way's modern classic. In this introduction, we summarize their arguments, outline the empirical findings for Africa, and review the critiques. In doing so we provide the background for the contributions to this special issue.

Keywords Comparative politics · Political regimes · Autocratization · Competitive authoritarianism · Africa

The third wave of democratization and the end of the Cold War made multiparty elections a common phenomenon across the globe.¹ The initial euphoria that accompanied the political changes of the early 1990s soon gave way to the realization that elections do not automatically result in fully democratized regimes (Schedler 1998;
